

Many parents find themselves perplexed, unsure and often helpless when forced to bring their children face to face with difficult and complex facts of life. When one of them discovers that he/she has contracted cancer, parents find themselves in a difficult situation that raises many concerns and dilemmas as they tell their children about the nature of the disease, prepare them for the changes that will take place in the family's lifestyle and support them while the ill parent goes through such a difficult time. Sivan Rosen Geta's book provides a sensitive, wise and correct solution for this important need. Sivan felt the need to write this book after she herself contracted cancer and could not find appropriate material among the existing children's literature when attempting to tell her daughter about the disease. The book is written in simple language, it is sensitive and warm and provides parents with an excellent tool as they contemplate how to tell their children that one of their parents has cancer and how the family can prepare and support the children during such an anxious time, using language and images suited to preschoolers and young children (ages 3-7).
